Not illustrated. 1869 Excerpt: .to transfer the legal title to landed property from one owner to another are usually called conveyances. These conveyances may be leases for terms of years, deeds conveying life estates, and deeds in fee simple. First as to leases. These may be for a short or long term. For vacant ground they are usually made for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, at a certain rent to be paid quarterly or semi-annually or yearly as the parties may agree. They generally contain a stipulation that if the rent is not punctually paid, or if the taxes and assessments are not paid at the proper time, the lease shall become void. In order to avoid the lease for the mere non-payment of rent the common law requires that the landlord on the day the rent becomes due and a short time before sun-down, say within ten minutes, shall make demand of the exact amount of rent due on that day accruing since the last quarterly or semi-annually or yearly payment. The exact amount due and no more must be claimed. If the amount due on a former quarter is also included in the amount demanded, the demand is illegal, because the amount due on the former payment must have been demanded on the day it was due. A demand on any day after or before the rent is due will not create a forfeiture. The demand must be made at the leasehold premises, or it will not cause a forfeiture unless a different...
