Not illustrated. 1871 Excerpt: .(boleadora), they spring upon him, and instantly proceed to bleed him. The women catch the blood in a wooden bowl, in which they allow it to cool, after having freed it from albumen by stirring it with the hand. While this is being done, the men turn the animal on to its back, cut open the skin from the lower lip to the root of the tail, and at each hoof they make other cuts meeting the first at the chest and at the lower part of the belly. They begin by detaching the skin of the neck, the chest, and the thin parts with their knives, and finish the work with their hands alone, seizing the skin firmly with the left, and passing the right between the skin and the flesh. When the flaying is completed, they separate the head from the trunk, remove the shoulders, open the belly on both sides to the end of the ribs, which they separate from the backbone in one piece, after having divided the bone with their knives. Lastly, without the help of either cleavers or hammers, they cut into two equal parts the hind-quarters. In less than ten minutes all this is done, and numerous spectators, seated on the very spot, are devouring with ferocious avidity hot livers, hearts, lungs, and raw kidneys, dipped in blood, which they afterwards drink. The skin of the head serves to make coverings for boleadoras; the mane is carefully tied up...
