The Civilizing Effects of the Former and the Demoralization Caused By the Latter--An Address Delivered Before the Minnesota State Horticultural Society at the Annual Meeting January, 1879. By Peter M. Gideon, Of Excelsior, Minn. Omitted from the Report of 1879, and now printed by order of the Society. Mr. President and Fellow Citizens: I presume that we all feel that we came here to promote State and national greatness, by encouraging the growth of fruit. The culture and use of fruit we hold to be the greatest of all civilizing elements known to man, and the more and better, the greater the advancement of moral refinement; and to that end we are here to ascertain the best in quality that are adapted to our climate. And not only to ascertain the best now extant, but to encourage the production of more and better, as well as the best mode of culture. The history of all nations shows that national greatness keeps pace with the luxuries of life, and that the most attractive, longed for and sought after luxury is fruit. And in proof of the moralizing influence of fruit is the fact that fruit growers seldom use tobacco, beer or whisky, and that their children seldom become thieves. And that for the reason above stated, that of all luxuries fruit is the most tempting, and those that have not got a supply, look wistfully at that of others,...
