Excerpt: . . . about students, such as prohibiting the release of data from the student-testing program to any marketing organization without the written permission of the parent or guardian. Other proposed bills addressed a variety of issues, such as allowing schools to sell advertising and accept supplies bearing logos or other corporate images or requiring school boards to disclose the portion of proceeds from fundraising activities that is contributed to the school activity fund. See appendix III for a state-by-state listing of legislative proposals. In updating the site visit information we collected in 2000, we found only Commercial Activities in slight changes in commercial activities in all seven school districts. All the Seven Districts We districts reported they continued to engage in product sales and display Visited in 2000 Have Not advertising. As we found earlier, most commercial activities, particularly Generally Changed product sales and advertising, occurred in high schools. All the high schools we visited in 2000 still sold soft drinks, and most sold snack or fast food. To varying degrees, all displayed corporate advertising. High schools continued to report the receipt of unsolicited samples, such as toiletries, gum, razors, and candy, that they did not distribute to students. In contrast, the elementary schools we contacted did not sell carbonated soft drinks to students or display corporate advertising. Grocery and department store rebate programs continued to operate in almost all schools, but coupon redemption programs were largely an elementary school enterprise. As we found before, none of the districts reported using corporate-sponsored educational materials or engaging in market research for commercial purposes. Officials did report some changes in commercial activities. Three of these districts...
